

Facts and Opinions: Colonial America

People use both facts and opinions when talking about history. Here's how to tell the difference.

A fact is a true statement you can prove. Facts can be measured, observed, or looked up in official records.

An opinion is something a person believes, thinks, or feels. Opinions can't be proven true for everyone.

Take a look at examples of facts and opinions about colonial America:

In the Thirteen Colonies, most families lived in rural areas.

This statement is a fact. It can be proven by researching original housing documents from the 1700s.

In the Thirteen Colonies, it was better to live in rural areas than in cities.

This statement is an opinion. It is what one person thinks, and it can't be proven true for everyone.

Directions: Read each statement below. Circle the correct answer.

- Benjamin Franklin was born in Boston, Massachusetts.
fact opinion
- The lost colony of Roanoke Island is an interesting mystery to think about.
fact opinion
- Only men arrived on the first voyage to Jamestown in 1607.
fact opinion
- The Mayflower is the most important ship to ever cross the Atlantic Ocean.
fact opinion
- The Thirteen Colonies declared their independence from Great Britain in 1776.
fact opinion
- The United States Constitution was written in 1787.
fact opinion
- George Washington was the greatest colonial leader.
fact opinion