Map of Ancient and Modern Egypt

Did you know: the Nile river flows from the southern region of the country to the north and eventually the Mediterranean Sea? The reason the southern part of Egypt was called Upper Egypt is because of the higher elevation of the mountains there. The river flows down to flat delta land, which is why the north was called Lower Egypt. In ancient times this geographic difference separated modern Egypt in to two countries until they formed one nation to combine the wealth of gold in the south and the grain that was grown in the north.
