The History of Tokyo

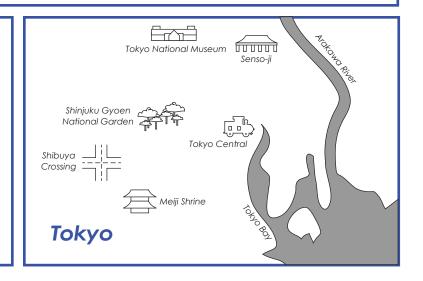

The first inhabitants of the area that would become Tokyo lived there as early as 10,000 BCE. These early peoples were hunters, fishers, and gatherers. The city was founded in the 12th century, during the period when shoguns, or military dictators, ruled the country. Around 1450, local ruler Edo Taro Shigenada built a castle there. The city was then named Edo, after its founder. Over the next three centuries, the city expanded rapidly, growing to over a million residents by the end of the 1700s. It became the cultural and political capital of Japan. In 1868, the city's name was formally changed to Tokyo, meaning "eastern capital" in Japanese. In 1869, Emperor Meiji made the city's status official when he made it the capital of Japan. The earthquake of 1923 was the biggest disaster in the history of Japan, ruining much of the city and causing widespread fires. During World War II, large sections of the city were destroyed by bombings, once in 1944 and again in 1945. The city eventually rebuilt, and in 1964, Tokyo hosted the Summer Olympics. It was the first time the Olympics were ever held in Asia. Major earthquakes hit Japan in 1995 and again in 2011, but Tokyo's earthquake-resistant infrastructure saved it from major damage. Today, the population of the city of Tokyo stands at 12 million people.
